

Dear Coach

It is a very close game today; we almost had a x-point comeback. We are very effective within the arc today, going x-y (z%) from twos, mainly consisting of mid-ranges and layups. We are also very good at passing the ball today, with x assists on y made buckets. We had x points off opponent's turnovers, with y steals in total. We went on an x-y run to close the x-point gap to regain some confidence and kept the game competitive. We grabbed x offensive boards, leading to x second-chance points. Both teams grabbed the same number of rebounds today (all x, we had y extra offensive board, and they had z extra defensive board) despite our slight height disadvantage, which is very impressive. We are also great at turnover control today, with us only having x and opponent with y total turnovers.

However, the main reason for our defeat is opponent's three-pointers. They made x threes with y total attempts (z%), while we shot x out of y from three in total (z%). Opponent scored all of its major runs, including a x-y run, from three pointers. The second major reason that led to our opponent's victory is free throws. Opponent attempted x free throws in total, a stark contrast to our y attempts. They made x (y%) out of those, and we made only x out of our y attempts (z%). We had x more fouls than opponent in total. Opponent also scored x points off our turnovers. Both teams had similar FG%, with Opponent x% more efficient than us (x%-y%). We were as close a x points to them, but we failed to maintain that difference, failing to be able to lock them down from beyond the arc.
